Fear, Anger and Denial are Symptoms of America's Changing Majority

April 5, 2010

“Baby killer”, “Reload”, and “Hell no, you can’t” are some of the current phrases pronounced by conservative Republican leadership Randy Neugebauer (Texas), Sarah Palin (Alaska) and John Boehner (Ohio) about the passing of President Obama’s health care reform bill. Prior to its passage, openly gay Congressman Barney Frank (Massachusetts) was called the “f” word. Even members of the Congressional Black Caucus were called the “n” word, with one person, Emanuel Clever (Missouri), being spat upon as members of the Tea Party chanted, “Kill the bill!” through the halls of Congress. Sadly, Michele Bachmann (Minnesota) stated at a recent rally that because there was no video or audio evidence of such incidents, the incidents never happened. How ludicrous is that?

These constant hurls of insult, disrespect, and threat to our nation’s African American or Gay American leadership by other voices of leadership and their following have presented a constant trek up the hill of hatred for awhile. As a person who has trained hundreds, perhaps thousands, in cultural diversity workshops, I believe that racism is a possible underlying cause of the recent insanity. I have often wondered what will result from people’s fear of the changing demographic landscape of the United States by 2040-2050. After all, the media continues to hype these projected changes: “Whites no longer to be the majority by 2050.”

Since the election of Barack Obama, we have been told there was record turnout for people of color and the youth who helped to make history. While that has seemed wonderful for some of us, it angers, frustrates, and incites others. Presidential candidate Obama received more death threats, and continues to receive more death threats, than any other U.S. President.

Simply stated, racism is the cause for that. It is not my intent to say that all European Americans are racists. However, my professional experience has taught me that most European Americans do not have to think about their skin color as the means holding them back from accomplishing their dreams or desires. Unfortunately, this is not the case for people of color, not one.

Neither am I saying that people of color do not have opportunity to succeed and achieve as their counterparts do. Yet, the color of one’s skin can and does have a negative impact. With changing demographics, our history as a nation who enslaved other peoples continues to haunt us. That reality is evident all across America and it appears to be converging at 1600 Pennsylvania Avenue. Just last week, a group of “skin heads” were convicted of plotting to assassinate then candidate Obama.

With a struggling economy, along with constant barrage of hate mongering from the right wing media and some conservative legislative leaders, we may be seeing only the beginning of a new trend. It is my hope that we can begin to speak openly and civilly about our anxieties. Otherwise the waters ahead will be even more difficult to navigate for our elected leaders. That would not be good for any of us, black, white, brown, red or yellow skinned, for we all love our country and are proud to be American. Only together can we go through these difficult times.

The United Church of Christ has more than 5,300 churches throughout the United States. Rooted in the Christian traditions of congregational governance and covenantal relationships, each UCC setting speaks only for itself and not on behalf of every UCC congregation. UCC members and churches are free to differ on important social issues, even as the UCC remains principally committed to unity in the midst of our diversity.
